City Girl Goes Country (Part 8) One Month Later.

Thursday, June 20, 2013

I took this photo before we left for Europe

I was trying to highlight the fence that DH built to defend our produce from the local wildlife.

My last 11 blog entries concerned our vacation adventures and now it's time to focus close to home.

This is how our garden looks now. It seems that nature did its job without any help from us. We were lucky that we had enough rain. Now DH is working hard weeding.

The fence kept the critters out. In fact, I saw one bunny rabbit with his nose right up against the fence trying to nibble through it. I wish I could have gotten a picture of that.

So far so good!

When I had my garden back home the rabbits were going after my peanut plants so I put up the fence as soon as I could. The next day my backyard neighbors said they saw a full row of bunnies lined up outside the fence staring at the garden, looking very sad.

That's an effective fence! I'd like to have that produce outside my back door!

garden looks great, and none the worse for the weather, and nice fence

Looks really good! We need your DH's expertise on the fence. Or else the coyote urine someone recommended.

Well done! The garden looks great. I see some healthy eating in the future.

I've noticed the gardeners in our area have added height to their fences. The mild winter means more deer. We also have more rabbits. They've been after my hostas. Time for the coyotes to make their appearance.

That weeding can be a chore! At least you had enough rain to keep the garden alive while you were gone. Ours would be dead without just a couple of days of water!

What a difference a month makes . . . with the right amount of rain!!

garden! We've tried gardening, but we don't have "the right yard" for gardening. Bad soil and way to shady. I see some healthy eating in the future and it tastes so much better when you've grown it.

That looks suspiciously like a package of Twinkie seeds in DH's hand!

Nice garden! We didn't put up fence...and the critters are biting off the tops of my plants. Last year, no fence, no problems...this year...guess they will eat anything. DH refuses to put up a fence, so we'll see how it goes. Maybe a bite of a jalapeño will make them think twice!!!

Great garden! But oh, weeding is my nemesis. But you know what? I find weeding kind of cathartic and soothing. Not sure why.....

I see green! As in salad / veggies in their natural habitat! Well done not watching the pot come to a boil!
