Monsanto Strikes Back – (Star Wars pun intended)

Thursday, May 08, 2014

Perhaps the reaction to increased information about pesticides, additives and GMOs is having an effect?

Maybe the money poured into the defeat of labeling initiatives and referenda isn't enough?

Dow Chemical used to have an advertising slogan commonly shortened as "Better Living through Chemistry."

Is that always true?

Edit:

Phebes' comment reminded me of another article, all part of an effort to discredit the "health nuts" and hysterical "food police" among us.

Forbes recently published:

Foods banned in the US and not elsewhere

www.forbes.com/sites/emilywillingham/2013/06/25/8-foods-the-usa-bans-but-other-nations-dont/

Perhaps the Empire is feeling threatened?

Much produce brought into the U.S. is grown with chemical sprays that were banned here way back. The inspection process includes a small percentage of the produce and often the inspectors are connected to the growers. Hmm.

Here I can't buy locally grown table grapes (so you go to the gate and buy from the stall) as the big super markets are buying from overseas. A lot of growers are burying their fruit as they can't get a buyer.

Terrible situation.

Just about the only thing I can agree with Mr. Fraley about is the quote: "Consider the source." I can't come up with anything better than the old chestnut that I would trust him about as far as I can throw him.

I, and the majority of Americans, want MANDATORY labeling. And he is scared out of his skin that people will stop buying GM products. If they were really as safe and wonderful as he claims, he shouldn't have to worry.

Yup, I share your preference for "food" and not "Frankenfood".

Ugh - do these companies realize that much of the rest of the world refuses to buy American food products because of all the chemicals, additives, and GMO stuff? They aren't going to make money by changing food to food-like substances!!!
