Now here's something you don't see every day – A HOUSE in the road!

Tuesday, November 25, 2014

It was right at the end of my driveway. That prompted a change of running route. I watched with neighbors for a while then ran in the opposite direction. I returned in time to see it proceeding on its way.

There it goes!

The house was on a farm behind us which will now become a housing development. Many neighbors opposed the rezoning, but it's OK with me. If some earlier farmer hadn't sold his land, MY house wouldn't be here. So, I'll graciously welcome the newcomers.

I hope you will get new neighbors that you will like. I am always sorry to see family farms go (although you didn't mention whether it was a family farm or a factory farm), but surely the only constant in life is change.

Not something you see every day, for sure. It's a fascinating process, moving a complete house! Hopefully it will have a new home and be loved!

Brings back memories. When I was 4, my parents bought a 6 bedroom house for $3,000.05. They only won the bid because my dad had added the nickle on the end being funny. We had to move it to our farm and it was an all day affair. 2 flatbed semi's had to drive side by side in perfect sync, and the utility and phone company had to go with us to lift the wires.

We moved a couple houses about 28 years ago -- and it was a fascinating project --

It's fascinating to me how they can move a house like that.

I admire your attitude about the rezoning. No wonder you seem so healthy!

No, not something you see everyday!

I love your attitude about the rezoning. I'm reminded of people who are SO against immigrants coming to the US -- like ALL our forebears weren't immigrants at one point!

Our house faces a river with a small acreage bordering it. For the first 20 years it had horses and a very old, rundown barn. It was sold 2 years ago and now has dump trucks, cats, graders, and piles of gravel. We're not very happy about it, but that's what happens when you live in an unzoned area.

I understand both points of view. I don't like overcrowded subdivisions, but many of our homes would not exist if the land we own wasn't parceled.

Happy Thanksgiving
